Cost-effectiveness of universal ART for prevention of vertical transmission of HIV. We explored the cost-effectiveness of introducing universal antiretroviral therapy (ART) to prevent vertical transmission from HIV-infected mothers in Kwa-Zulu Natal, South Africa. We calculated the direct and indirect cost-effectiveness of introducing universal ART for prevention of vertical transmission of HIV. Costs were measured from the perspective of the health system. Outcomes were the number of HIV-infected children alive and the number of HIV-infected children deceased. Survival data were obtained from the District Health System. The probability and cost of losing a mother to death, having an infant death, and of an infant surviving were obtained from published data. The probability of primary vertical transmission was obtained from a mathematical model. We multiplied the number of living HIV-infected children by the number of HIV-infected children who died to obtain a measure of cost and by the number of living HIV-infected children to obtain the measure of effectiveness. We calculated the incremental cost-effectiveness ratio to determine the cost-effectiveness of universal ART for prevention of vertical transmission of HIV. Costs were divided by the number of HIV-infected children alive to determine the incremental cost per HIV-infected child alive. Costs were also divided by the number of HIV-infected children who died to calculate the incremental cost per HIV-infected child who died. We calculated the incremental cost-effectiveness ratio (ICER) and the incremental cost-utility ratio (ICUR). The ICER was US$495 (2010 currency) per HIV-infected child alive. The ICUR was US$842 per HIV-infected child alive. Universal ART for prevention of vertical transmission of HIV was not a cost-effective use of resources. The high-profile investigation into corruption in the Ontario legislature shut down on Thursday, but it has given new life to the Ontario Civil Liberties Association's push for the creation of a commission of inquiry into the scandal. Established as a virtual retort to a commission of investigation into the Mike Harris government
